RESERVE GRAZING

PROBLEM BEFORE THE NEXT FOREST CONGRESS.

Entire Day's Session Will Be Devoted to It—A Pre-eminent Issue in Two-Fifths of the United States—Possible Harmony in Sight Between Competitive Stock Interests—Recent Conference at Denver Was of Value.

The American Forest congress at meeting in January next will devote one day's session to a consideration of the relation of the public forests to grazing. Only those who thoroughly understand conditions in the West can appreciate how important the question of grazing is in connection with the welfare of the country.

Grazing is the principal industry in nearly half of the United States. In the arid region of the country it is about two-fifths of its entire area, from about the middle of the continent westerly nearly to the Pacific ocean, and the greater part of the region is natural grazing land. It is open, but much of it, particularly in the more mountainous parts, is covered or partly forested. The forests vary from the scanty vegetation of the deserts to the thick turf of the mountain parks and the varied growth of herbage and young trees in the interior of the forest.

During the excessive heat of summer it is customary to drive the cattle and sheep up into the forests, where the climate is cooler and the pasture better. This means that the young growth is trampled and browsed and the spongy soil packed or cut by hoofs.

That floods and serious soil erosion follow, while the prospects of forest reproduction are greatly endangered. Hence it is often necessary to exclude both sheep and cattle. Such regulations are generally made rigid against sheep, which do the worst damage.

Peril of Overgrazing. That the land best suited to grazing should be given over to it is self-evident. But neither the public domain nor the forests should be overgrazed. Forests are essential to irrigation plans for reclaiming arid lands. The fact that sheep successfully graze upon areas partly or wholly inaccessible to cattle has led to a high in the mountains and near the headwaters of streams, where speedy and great damage can be done the protective influence of forests. In addition, sheep are generally herded or concentrated on small areas; thus their grazing has an intensive character peculiarly destructive. For these reasons, and because of special local conditions, sheep are entirely excluded from some forest reserves, while in others their grazing is more stringently regulated than that of cattle.

Hitherto there has been continual conflict between the sheep and cattle men for grazing locations, and the limitation of the claims of each in the reserves has been one of the most embarrassing and difficult questions of forest control. Happily, through a recent conference at Denver, there has been the fullest and most amicable interchange of views in the history of the business. It is expected there will be less friction between them in the future than in the past.

That the bureau of forestry keenly appreciates the importance of the grazing question is shown by the instructions it gives its field force examining lands with a view to forming new reserves or revising the boundaries of existing reserves. Its agents must give definite and full reports on all the following queries:

Issues in Details.

Demand upon the range; to what extent the prosperity of the local residents depends upon livestock; how many stock are using the reserve, and how distributed; where owned; whether stockmen own ranches or reside in the reserve; their home residence; to what extent, as a summer range, the proposed reserve limits outside range; whether it includes lambing grounds; conflicting interests as between sheep and cattle, local and outside stock, etc.; merits of the controversy; description of the character of the grazing lands; the extent of open parks and pasture in timber; to what extent grazing has injured the range or forest; the manner of handling stock; the size of herds or bands; areas, if any, from which stock should be excluded; division of pasture lands; recommendations for a plan of control, giving the number of stock and length of grazing season to be allowed, and any special regulations necessary; and the practicability of a division of range into individual ranges. It is only after exhaustive examination and full report that action is taken limiting grazing rights.

The forest reserve policy of the national government involves many important questions which are yet to be settled. The approaching American Forest congress, to be held in Washington, D. C., will give the best opportunity that has ever been offered for their broad discussion. This meeting has aroused wide interest among cattle and sheepmen and their associations. A large representation from the grazing industry is expected at the congress, and far-reaching good is likely to result from its deliberation.

Flowering Plants.

What nicer Christmas present than a blooming plant. Forsythia, florist, has them; also ferns, palms and holly, with the berries on. Telephone black 1631.
